How to Start and Grow Your Own Natural Health Farm In today's world, with the food industry's marketing and influence, how do we make good health decisions? And how can we make those decisions in a way that cultivates quality products and addresses our health care system's needs? Well, one way is to grow our own food and avoid factory-made, packaged, canned, or fast food. When my husband and I started living in the country we began farming our own food as well as working with our neighbors on the land in an effort to help improve the food system. We didn't know what we were doing, nor did we have a traditional farm or the necessary equipment to grow our own food, but after a few mistakes we learned a lot and now we're happy to say that we're growing organic food at our family farm and we're a big part of the solution to the agricultural industry's pollution, genetic monocultures, and farming methods. It's hard work, but it's something we feel good about and feel proud of. A fact about farms that makes it feel good is the fact that it creates a unique culture and community. So, while farming is hard work, it's a rewarding thing to do if you truly want to be a part of a solution to environmental issues. So, with that said, if you're thinking about starting your own natural health farm, here are a few tips that will help. Plan ahead It's better to take a couple of months to plan ahead and decide what type of farm you want to start. You can do this by researching what products you want to grow. Once you've decided on the products you want to grow, plan out the areas of your farm where you will grow them. Where will you grow your food? How will you store it? Are you going to work with other farmers? Do you want to use your farm as a community gathering place? What is your plan for your farm? Do you want to sell your products directly to consumers? There are so many options that it can be hard to
