Aluminum-dependent immobilization and reactivation of recombinant pyrroloquinoline quinone dehydrogenase from Thermus thermophilus HB8. Pyrroloquinoline quinone (PQQ)-dependent dehydrogenases play significant roles in a wide range of biological processes. PQQ metabolism in pyrroloquinoline quinone-producing organisms seems to be fairly well studied, but this is not the case in PQQ-utilizing organisms, including the hyperthermophilic archaeon Thermus thermophilus HB8. In this study, we established an immobilization system for T. thermophilus PQQDH in which the protein remained active after immobilization. Further analysis revealed that protein immobilization did not affect the stability of the purified protein. In this system, PQQDH is immobilized on carbon nanotubes. The immobilized T. thermophilus PQQDH was activated by addition of aluminum sulfate, and this reactivation was completely abolished by adding EDTA, suggesting that aluminum ions are involved in the reactivation of the immobilized enzyme. The immobilized enzyme retained significant activity after several reactivation procedures, even in the presence of aluminum ions. This work shows the successful immobilization of PQQDH on carbon nanotubes and the concomitant reactivation of PQQDH immobilized on carbon nanotubes by aluminum ions. These findings may be useful for future applications of the immobilized enzyme. The only true weakness with Yahoo!, according to his admission, was a lack of content. Google, however, is proficient at indexing other people's content, not its own. Furthermore, the starting point is simple: Google depends on other people to create most of the content it exists to index. In a meta-analysis of Web search-results (1997-2001), well over half of all the search-engine queries were queries for pages and sites created by the users themselves (i.e. this is not counting queries for products and products ads). Wikipedia's sister site, Wikiquote, turned out to be the most frequently searched for site, with a surprising 76.3% share of the total combined searches. The point, however, is that most of the content that made up the search
